

New Website Only Shows Users Jobs from Employer-Website Career Pages, Accepts No Advertising

July 16, 2007

Pasadena, CA—An entrepreneur in Pasadena, California, is doing his best to change the way people throughout the world find jobs. Hound.com founder Harrison Barnes should know how the job-search industry operates; he has spent millions of dollars advertising on sites like Monster and CareerBuilder for his various recruiting companies over the past several years and believes that the entire job-search market is about to change with new technology he has been developing over the past seven months.

Barnes believes a sea change is needed in the way most of the world finds jobs. Hound.com is a job search engine that only searches employer websites for jobs and then ranks these results according to users' likely levels of interest. Barnes believes that virtually every other job board is composed of "spam" jobs and wants to eliminate spam from the job-search process.

"Most jobs out there are on employer websites," said Barnes. "They are not on Monster, CareerBuilder, or other sites. Most employers do not advertise their jobs effectively. Moreover, most job boards are mainly composed for recruiter jobs, and recruiters are acting as conduits for employers. Hound allows job seekers to approach real employers and the people with the real jobs."

Hound accepts no advertising and does no advertising. The site aims to be the "purest" job board in the world by putting the job seeker's interests first.

"I do not want any advertising right now—we're turning it away. Our site is neutral. The only thing I care about is the users and ensuring they get the most relevant search results. We're not even requiring registration. Lots of lives are going to be changed by this search engine, and the only thing I want to do is stand back and let it do its job," said Barnes.

There are no sponsored jobs or advertisers whatsoever on the site. Barnes is currently paying more than 100 programmers to work on Hound.com and said he is adding more and more programmers each week.

"There is simply no better way to find a position than using this site, and people are going to realize this," said Barnes.
